UNDERSTAND THE DRIVERS OF CONSUMER BEHAVIOR

WHAT MOTIVATES YOUR CONSUMERS?

Nielsen Scarborough already sheds light on the WHO, WHAT and WHERE of local consumer life. Now, you can tap into the WHY – those key motivators and attitudes of consumers – with the Nielsen Scarborough/GfK MRI Attitudinal Insights Module.

The product combines GfK MRI attitudinal data with Nielsen Scarborough into a single, integrated database. You can use the Attitudinal Insights Module to examine consumer attitudes in conjunction with media consumption or purchasing behaviors. These insights are essential to:

- Finding out what motivates people to make a purchase
- Examining openness to advertising among key consumer targets
- Identifying key segments of the population, such as technology early adopters, patriotic consumers or brand loyal moms
- Examining motivations behind consumer interest in advertising, usage of social media, their process behind making healthcare decisions, and much more

HOW IT WORKS

GfK MRI attitudinal data is merged with syndicated Nielsen Scarborough at the respondent level, so that the two data sets can be freely crossed, combined, or otherwise analyzed.

The Nielsen Scarborough GfK MRI Attitudinal Insights Module provides access to 400+ new variables that reflect consumer psychographics in 13 different categories.

Baltimore adults are 11% more likely to agree to paying more for high-quality hotel accommodations AND 14% more likely to paying more to fly on their favorite airline, than the average U.S. adult.

Chicago adults boast high brand loyalty to their vehicles. They are 19% percent more likely than the average U.S. adult to agree completely with the statement “I’m loyal to my vehicle brands and stick with them.” New York and San Diego adults are more likely to disagree completely with that statement.
